Because we are a compassionate people, we have provided government subsidies to agencies like Head Start, which have had the effect of making low income families more isolated. And we have tried to make sure that poor families have access to counseling, daycare, mental health treatment, and other supports to make sure that their children can learn and grow. Does that make them ideal parents? Probably not - but they do tend to be fairly good, caring, and capable people. But it has been demonstrated time and again that when they do get a chance to parent, poor parents aren't up to the task, and often even try to discourage their children from trying to bond with them. When I started this article, I was ready to slam poor parents for that lack of parenting skills. But I decided to ask myself "what is a parent?" and decided to go back and look for a definition. There are many definitions of the role of parents. One is a biological parent, in which case the parents, or biological parents, are usually considered to be the ones who raise the children until they are old enough to go to school. But in modern societies, many parents are both biological and adoptive, and the parents raise the children until they are old enough to start to make their own way in society. The common thread among all of those definitions is the concept that parents act as the parents of the children, and not as the parents of the children. As in, "I'm going to raise this child to be a responsible, well-adjusted adult. And by the way, he isn't your child, nor are you his mommy or daddy". Parents are recognized as the parents of the children because they are supposed to act like the
