So, how can Clean Master instruments be incorporated into your camera's own profiling? It's simple. It's done using the camera's own Profiles, which will often churn out much better results than the external instrument in the event that the external instrument doesn't account for all the conditions in the image. Take three screenshots of the right-most Profiles tab: it tells you the profile currently being applied to all the colors being corrected, adjustments that have been made in each channel (light, exposure, etc.), and in the case of RAW files, the edit made in Adobe Camera Raw. All of this information is displayed in the same window as the image and is super-easy to access if you need to. Next, save all three screenshots in an external folder. Until these three screenshots can be incorporated into the camera, the only option is to use Clean Master. You can also create a blacklist to remove certain colors, which should help to keep your images more stable in the future. Let's see how this feature works in the field. I'm not a total noobie when it comes to digital cameras, so the fact that I'm even interested in such an advanced feature is a sign of stupidity. Previous versions of Lightroom would automatically kick in the exposure range from the center of the file in RAW-processing, saving the newly processed image without leaving room in the timeline for any additional editing. Lightroom 5, however, now enables you to switch this option so that the center of the image is actually processed as part of the adjustment rather than the automatically-selected exposure level. I find this to be one of Lightroom's most useful upgrades, as it keeps my files a lot cleaner since I can select exactly how much adjustment I'd like to apply. Pretty soon, it might even be possible to broadcast your Lightroom editing range online so that people can edit and enjoy your photos without having to pay huge fees per image.

When users combine Photoshop layers or Smart Objects, they turn a simple flat image into a layered image with complex properties. Now, when the Smart Objects move, objects inside of them move as a single unit with a corresponding change to the parent layer. For example, if a person in a photo moves, his hands will also move. As a result, objects in the photo are always in a consistent location, even as the photo moves and rotates. Designers and other professionals can now create complex textures for indoor and outdoor spaces. The new Text Kit gives users a way to add fully-textured, interactive textures to their designs, using shape, geometry, color, gradient and lighting information.
